Dr. Stephanie Stepp is an Associate Professor of Psychiatry and Psychology at the University Of Pittsburgh School Of Medicine. Her research focuses on identifying factors that predict the onset of borderline personality disorder during adolescence. With support from the National Institutes of Health, Dr. Stepp is examining whether individual differences in psychosocial and physiological mechanisms underlying emotional reactivity can help explain developmental pathways to borderline personality disorder.